THE PSYCHOLOGY OF EDWARD BRADFORD
TITCHENER.

EDWARD Bradford Titchener was born in Chichester, England, January 11, 1867, and died suddenly in Ithaca, N. Y., August 3, 1927. Of an old English family, he was educated at Malvern College, Oxford, and Leipzig. He received the A.B. degree from Oxford in 1890, with a double first. While at Oxford he was Senior Scholar in Philosophy and the Classics and Senior Hulmian Exhibitioner of Brasenose College. Immediately after leaving Oxford he went to Leipzig where he found Wundt in his prime, and where he came into contact with a number of students and others who have since distinguished themselves. Külpe was Dozent, Frank Angell, Pace, Scripture, Warren, Witmer, Kiesow, Kirschmann, Meumann, were among the students in the Institut at the time Titchener was working there. After receiving the doctorate, he came to Cornell as Assistant Professor in 1892, at the age of twenty-five. The laboratory had been started by Frank Angell the year before, but that year had given little more than time to order apparatus and make preparations, so that Titchener came to what was practically a virgin field. He developed the laboratory from an original suite of six rooms, cut from what had been two old recitation rooms, to a well arranged and equipped group of twenty-six, occupying two floors. Titchener was advanced to the Professorship in 1895 and spent the rest of his life in Ithaca, in spite of several invitations to go to other universities. As teacher and investigator his life was thoroughly bound up with Cornell University.¹

¹ I shall not attempt to portray the personal side of Titchener. That has been done so well and so sympathetically by Professor Boring, in the American Journal
