ETHICS

VOLUME I, NUMBER 3

September 1987

MUSINGS

A Habitat of Lies
by Marjorie Kelly

In a culture rife with lying, we can construct a personal environment of truth—a place where we can take the risk of opening up with one another.

4

NOTEBOOK

M. Scott Peck on the nature of evil in everyday life . . . ads with the expansiveness of friendship . . . why hostility is toxic . . . spotting fraud in accounting . . . and more.

6

AMONG FRIENDS

How Can You Tell When Someone's Lying?

It's in the eyes, the gestures, the inconsistencies, some readers say. Others say you can't tell, and shouldn't bother trying. Answers to the reader questionnaire from the July issue.

8

A NEW VISION OF BUSINESS

William Norris and Control Data's Northside Plant
by James C. Worthy

Putting a factory in a riot-torn area of Minneapolis provided some unexpected challenges, and opportunities, for Control Data.

10

LIES

Thoughts on lying by Adrienne Rich, Adolf Hitler, Hannah Arendt, Friedrich Nietzsche, and Jean Piaget.

13

THE ECONOMIC OBSOLESCENCE OF WAR

The Rise of the Trading State
by Richard Rosecrance

Seizing territory once was the only way to increase national wealth. But since World War II, trade has proven a more efficient means to the same end.

14

PERSONAL ETHICS

The Dilemma of the Obnoxious Manager
by Barbara Ley Toffler

When Jane called the new manager a "fucking asshole" in front of his staff members, Mark felt he had to do something. But what?

16

BOOKEND

The Social Costs of Lying
by Sissela Bok

On the confidence liars have in their judgment, the personal wounds lies inflict, and determining when lies are justifiable.
